Property Rights and the Local Government Permitting Process

The Issue

Current local government permitting is a lengthy, burdensome, and complex process that infringes upon private property rights and violates the foundation and ideals that Texas was built upon. Overall, government regulations can comprise as much as 25% of a unit's final sales price—partly because local governments often change permitting and development rules midway through construction projects.

Imposing additional regulations in the middle of the construction process not only reduces the profit margin for builders, but diminishes the number of units developed and raises the cost of housing and operating a business. For every occurrence in which work is stopped for regulations requiring changes in the project, costs go up, and time that could have been spent building additional units is lost. For buyers, this translates to higher prices and decreased selection—an undesirable outcome for producers and consumers alike.

The number of onerous regulations, repeated checks, and unnecessary reviews that businesses have to pass for permits also generally causes a huge delay within the permit approval process. In Austin, for instance, regulatory delay adds on average 3.5 months to the process, compared to just three weeks of regulatory delay in Denver, Colorado, or less than a week in Raleigh, North Carolina, suggesting that Austin is dragging its feet in the approval of site plans.

In Harris County, the approval process for business permits can cause opening delays for up to six months while trying to comply with unnecessary provisions. In one instance, an individual rented a space to make and bottle fresh juices but was forced to have equipment and amenities completely unrelated to the business, such as grease taps and vent hoods. This caused almost a two-month delay to opening.

The effects of these regulations are not localized; they have far-reaching consequences on the lives of all individuals across the state. The tedious permitting process adds considerable time and costs to many sectors of the economy; it hinders construction projects and imposes undue burdens upon entrepreneurs and companies. This results in delays, higher construction costs, higher housing costs, higher prices paid by consumers, fewer jobs, and less economic growth.

One reason cities can add these costs with impunity is because they are not subject to the Texas Real Private Property Rights Preservation Act (RPPRPA). Passed into law by the Legislature in 1995, RPPRPA allows property owners to receive compensation for loss of property value due to new regulations on land use. Since the act exempts municipalities, none of the cities' zoning and permitting regulations are subject to RPPRPA, rendering the act essentially ineffective.

The Facts

- Meeting unnecessary criteria for the permitting process causes large delays of up to six months for businesses in certain municipalities.
- A report done in 2015 found that in Austin regulatory delay adds an average of 3.5 months to the already 4-month long permit approval process.

- Due to regulatory delays in the Austin permit review process, which stifles the production of new housing, “between 2004 and 2013 average rents in the Austin area increased by 50% while median incomes increased by just 9%.”
- According to the National Association of Homebuilders (NAHB), a nationwide survey of hundreds of single-family home builders found that “government regulations represented 25% of unit’s final sales price.”
- The Texas Real Private Property Rights Preservation Act, in Section 2007.002, allows property owners to seek compensation for any government action that reduces the market value of private property by 25% or more.

Recommendations

- Reduce the regulatory burden that local municipalities have on businesses and building by lowering the time for approval and certain code requirements for permits.
- Prohibit municipal and county governments from imposing new regulations or requirements after property owners have acquired the necessary permits and permission to begin development or construction.
- The Texas Real Private Property Rights Preservation Act should be amended to apply to municipal actions relating to the permitting process.
